Text Messaging as Relates to Literacy: Text It!

Neche Rush
College Learning Enhancement Program, Department of Literacy Education, Northern Illinois University

Introduction
Text messaging is one of the most popular forms of communication. According to the Pew Research Center, 95% of teens have used text messaging. The use of text messaging has been rising since 2008. This has led to the question, "Is this a form of literacy?" This form of communication has its own language. This language is a product of online culture and is heavily influenced by internet slang. This language is different from traditional written language. It is a form of literacy, but it is also a form of communication.

Method
In this study, 100 students were selected. They were asked to read the four methods and write about their understanding of them. The results were analyzed to determine if there was a relationship between understanding text messages and reading comprehension.

Results
The results showed that there is a significant relationship between understanding text messages and reading comprehension. Students who understood the four methods had a higher comprehension rate than those who did not.

Conclusions
The results of this study indicate that text messaging is a form of literacy. It is important for educators to teach students how to understand and use text messaging effectively.

The Motivation That a Teacher and Sports Can Give to Students: CRISTY REYES

A teacher can be your friend in the classroom and outside the classroom. You can talk to them. They can help you with your homework or just be there for you. A teacher has knowledge and experience that you can learn from. In sports, you learn about teamwork and how to work with others. Sports also require focus and determination.

Sports have other benefits like being able to express yourself through physical activity. It's a way to release stress and enjoy the outdoors. Sports also teach important life skills, such as坚持, teamwork, and communication.
