FIELD IX: AMERICAN LITERATURE SINCE 1865
REVISED: DECEMBER 2018
EFFECTIVE: JANUARY 2020

STATEMENT OF EXPECTATIONS

In order to demonstrate proficiency as a scholar in Later American Literature, the candidate’s writing will demonstrate confident, in-depth knowledge of
- major works, as defined in the first instance by the primary texts appearing on the reading lists,
- historical contexts and movements relating to those works, and
- scholarly approaches and criticism in the field, featuring the secondary texts appearing on the reading list.

The candidate’s writing will also demonstrate abilities to
- develop substantial and well-organized interpretive arguments,
- offer sophisticated analysis of primary texts, and
- engage dynamically with secondary critical sources.

In practical terms, the candidate taking the exam will
- address each question fully,
- use an essay structure that requires statement/support/explanation to develop its ideas, and
- use criticism or theory as relevant to analysis of the primary texts but not focus on the criticism or theory to the exclusion of the primary texts.

In preparing for examination, the candidate should study developments in the genres of drama, poetry, creative nonfiction, and fiction. The candidate should also become familiar with such “isms” as Realism, Naturalism, Modernism, Postmodernism, and multiculturalism while assessing the limitations of such categories. In general, the candidate may choose to build upon or challenge existing scholarship of whatever type.

The examiners will ask questions that can–and should–be addressed with texts on the reading list. If relevant to a question, however, the candidate may use any texts in the field, whether studied independently or through course work.
